Question A

According to the second paragraph, inbound tourism to Japan contributes / is essential to revitalizing its economy. Approximately 3 million foreign tourists visited Japan in March 2024. The Japanese government now expects to achieve / to reach its goal of welcoming 32 million tourists to the country by 2025.

Question B

The situation in which a local area's capacity and infrastructure are negatively affected by too many visitors / a rise in the number of tourists is known as overtourism. In the recent case of Japan, Kyoto City has decided to restrict tourists from entering [going into] / tourist access to the Gion district to protect geishas from aggressive photo-taking.

Question C

I agree with the government's push for more inbound tourism because it will help rebuild Japan. First, tourism is helping the economy bounce back from the effects of the travel restrictions of the past few years. Hotels and shops are now getting more than the normal number of customers, even making it necessary for new facilities to be built to accommodate visitors. Also, tourists are helping the world find out about the foods and traditions of Japan. This will lead to the appreciation of the uniqueness of this country, and as a consequence, will bring in more tourists. (98 words)

I think the government should stop pushing for more inbound tourism. Some areas simply don't have the necessary infrastructure in place. For example, I have heard complaints from foreign visitors to Niseko ski area that, although the snow is great, restaurants are full and bus service is poor. Overtourism is also affecting the daily life of local residents. In Sapporo, public transportation can be crowded with tourists with large suitcases, making it difficult for local people to commute to work. For a better experience for everyone, there should be fewer tourists, not more. (93 words)
